

International and Swedish Periodicals as A Tool for Disseminating Pedagogical Ideas of Sustainable Development

Viktoriia Chorna

Sodertorn University, Sweden

Abstract

Mass media always was (and still is) a very platform to form public opinion and to express own position on important social issues. In the context of this study, it is especially very important because the role of specialized newspapers or magazines during the last century cannot be overestimated.

The beginning of the XX century is characterized by the big pace of development of economics, science, technologies, and education (obviously). In archives we can find many magazines, and newspapers of different thematic focuses, including education and religion.

Journals and Newspapers always were (and still are) a very platform to form public opinion and to express own position on important social issues. In the context of this study, it is especially very important because the role of specialized newspapers or magazines during the last century cannot be overestimated.

The beginning of the XX century is characterized by the big pace of development of economics, science, technologies, and education (obviously). In archives we can find many magazines, and newspapers of different thematic focuses, including education and religion.

Keywords: religion, primary education, education for sustainable development