Abstract

In the context of globalization, the importance of Asian financial markets has become prominent, and Hong Kong is facing new challenges and opportunities. The objective of the study is to explore the development characteristics and successful experiences of Asian financial hubs such as Singapore, Tokyo, Shanghai, and Shenzhen through in-depth analysis, comparing the similarities and differences between Hong Kong and these cities in various aspects, and discussing the measures that Hong Kong can learn from. The main research method is the comparative research method. The results of the study revealed that Hong Kong should leverage its own advantages, learn from Singapore's regulatory model and Shanghai's policy incentives, and utilize its strengths as an international financial center to promote high-quality development in the financial industry.
